Brief notes about Exeter.....

Settlers to the current town-site came into the Huron Tract as early as in other areas along the London Road but flooding from the Ausable River impeded the first settlers staying. The Willis family arrived in 1832, the McConnell family in 1833. McConnell built a sawmill on the river, then a gristmill, with funds raised for blazing a trail from London. Due to the unpredictable river flooding, communities arose instead at Centralia, Rodgersville and Devon. In 1843, settlement picked up – Saunders arrived, Carling began a general store and tannery and Pickard brought a mercantile business and started a flourmill and other industry.

McConnell's Mill about one mile north of town became Francistown. Both sites amalgamated in 1873 as the village of Exeter. Belden's Atlas of 1879 recorded that it was "One of the loveliest villages in the western section of the province." In 1870, the London, Huron and Bruce built a railway station, a school appeared, and the Divisional Court was moved from Crediton. A building boom ensued. Entrepreneurial settlers – Trivitt, Southcott, Atcheson, Trick and Drew - were also early business starters. The Exeter Times was begun in 1873, the Advocate in 1881.

Around that time, there was an Exchange Bank, a Molsons Bank, the Verity Manufacturing plant, seven general stores, wagon and carriage factories, seven lawyers, four doctors, woolen and flax mills and a driving park.

Exeter was one of the last towns in Huron County to incorporate, in 1951. It continued to grow as RCAF Centralia began and it continues to grow rivaling the county seat, Goderich, in population and business activity.
